A minor complication, not resulting in any way from the operation, set in on Satur-day, but this has passed and his general condition was reported as being excellent. Pulse and temperature were also good yesterday evening. Throughout the day he rested comfortably, and was much better even than on Friday and Saturday.

A Glass-Enclosed Room with Filtered Air

The cooling of the brew for Dow "Old Stock" Ale, after it has been boiled in the brew kettle, takes place in a special glass-enclosed room, supplied with a steady flow of washed and filtered air.

Here the brew from the kettle flows down over a specially constructed copper cooler into containers that connect with the copper pipes leading to the Fermenting Room. This process agrates the brew and reduces it to the temperature at which the yeast in the Fermenting Process can work most effectively. It prepares it for the perfect development of all the qualities that make Dow "Old Stock" Ale such a satisfying and delicious drink.
